burning colors | alisha boae you keep creating and creating the same little statues of granite and gold and common gems all of them standing in one perfect line waiting, and desperate, for their chance to shine you try to shape me too, pummel me into submission but my spirit and i don't fit into your mold of perfect grades, SAT scores and college, and classrooms of limited knowledge yet you take a scalpel and chip away at me, all the while telling me that i'm not and never will be good enough to become another mindless statue but i've been watching the others that you harden in your fiery kiln and despite how beautiful they are, they always come out with a scar scars that cut and mark their grey skin and split their perfect smiles in half until they slowly start to crack under the weight of what they lack i pity them, but i learn how to rise up and paint my own skin with my colorful passions, my vibrant heart and i finally become art.

and now i'm able to look deep within,
and find piles upon piles of colors, more than i ever conjured in my fantasies which now are so in line with my realities.

i look within,
and find coral pink music and blue-bound books and yellow paintings of valleys so green that i need not wonder what i could have been for i am no longer another grey statue, alone and unseen now, i shine with the light of a thousand stars’ sheen.
