BACKGROUND SUMMARY

Initial findings of a study by the center for Civic Education indicates that high school students do not understand the basic concepts pertinent to the development and functions of our Constitution and national government. The findings were announced by the Center’s executive director, Charles N. Quigley, at a press conference with former Chief Justice Warren Burger.

Although students have learned some important milestones in our Constitutional history, they do not have a very profound understanding of our system of government. For example: seven out of ten do not know that in the American political tradition government derives its authority from the consent of the governed; two out of three do not know the essential difference between constitutional and dictatorial government; two-thirds do not know the importance of the Magna Carta; and, about six in ten do not know the meaning of due process of law.
