BACKGROUND SUMMARY

In 1994, 61% of school districts nationwide reported incidents of finding weapons on school grounds. It is estimated that more than 53% of American teenagers believe that threats of violence in their schools are indicated because students carry guns. According to the Center to Prevent Handgun Violence, handguns are an overwhelming choice of firearms for those who commit gun violence in schools.

In February 1994, a nine year-old neighbor boy pulled a high-powered military-style rifle from under a mattress and fired one round into the chest of his playmate, 7 year-old Kimberly Bracey of Los Angeles. What will happen to the boy is undetermined, but the adult owners of the gun must face the results of the Children’s Firearm Accident Protection Act of 1992, which provides that an adult can be sentenced to up to three years in state prison and fined $10,000 for keeping a loaded weapon that is accessible to a minor.

Security experts and child advocates advise schools to incorporate programs to prevent gun violence into their curricula, and to start educating children at an early age. Such programs must deal with attitudes and actions that endanger children and youth, not simply gun safety.

Dr. Mark Rosenberg, Dr. Patrick W. O’Carrol and Dr. Kenneth E. Powell from the division of Injury Control, National Center for Environmental Health, assembled seven panels who concluded:

a. There is a need to develop guidelines for those who would engage programs to prevent youth violence in general, in their own communities.

b. There is a need to support the design, implementation and evaluation of multi-faceted community-based youth violence prevention programs.

c. There is a need to develop a national system or infrastructure for preventing violence.

Gun violence is NOT just a problem of urban minorities. Guns and violence permeate everyone’s life, including the lives of school children. It is important for PTAs to support efforts to educate children starting at the earliest and most impressionable ages about the necessity for the utmost caution in the presence of firearms. This effort is as critical as PTA’s support for teaching children the importance of not speaking to strangers and of wearing safety belts when riding in a car.
